Coincidences can have significant, world-changing consequences. Try this. A fly goes out, simply looking for something tasty to eat. Simultaneously, a boy goes for a walk, searching for a creature to bring to a pet competition. Then wham! The boy and the fly collide. Coincidence or fate? Free will or determinism? Ok, perhaps that's a bit above the age level here, so anyway. But wait. The boy puts the fly into a jar, which doesn't exactly represent the height of good manners, but what can you do? Enraged, the fly lets out a roaring "buzz!" And what do you know? The boy happens to possess the nickname "Buzz." Coincidence or fate? In any case, after the boy, now known as "Buzz," shows the fly to his parents, they reject it outright as a pet and brutally attack it with a flyswatter. All this maniacal bug trapping and bug threatening doesn't present the most generous portrayal of human nature, but it's probably fairly accurate. In any case, the fly demonstrates his powers and the family bestows the name "Hombre Mosca" upon him. Before the enlightened duo march off to the contest, Hombre Mosca receives a hot dog about 100 times his size. And now they're gorging the poor thing. Geez. Flies apparently have it rough in a world of humans (though the fly doesn't seem to mind in this case). But the intelligent Hombre Mosca prevails over the nasty prejudices that humans hold against insects, especially the unwritten rule that "flies aren't pets," and proves himself to the judges with some fancy wing work. It all wraps up nicely in a fun and insect-empowering tale. This enjoyable Spanish translation of the popular "Hi, Fly Guy" book preserves all of the fun of the English version.
